College of Liberal Arts

FIND YOUR PLACE.
Welcome to Auburn University and the College of Liberal Arts. We are the heart and core of Auburn University, combining our love of knowledge and recognized expertise to enrich your intellectual development. Our student-centered approach will enhance your capacities to communicate with others, improve your critical thinking skills, and expand your horizons to think globally. We are proud to teach more Auburn University students than any other college and to be the academic home of professors who have won every major award for teaching and scholarship that Auburn has to offer.

We encourage you to explore all of our 39 bachelor degrees, which encompass the visual and performing arts, history, philosophy, English, foreign languages, economics, sociology, anthropology, political science, public and hospital administration, social work, psychology, communication, and journalism, and speech and communication disorders. All of our degrees offer you a wide-variety of career choices for employment in the 21st century.

Even if you should choose another college for your major, we invite you to add value to your major by choosing to minor in Women’s or Africana Studies, becoming a pre-law scholar, interacting with the Caroline Marshall Draughon Center for the Arts and Humanities, or serving others through our Community and Civic Engagement Initiative.

We look forward to touching your life in a meaningful way, helping you to excel in all of your future endeavors.

The Department of Art is a vibrant community of artists and art historians dedicated to teaching and mentoring students. The faculty promotes an atmosphere where experimentation, creative inquiry, critical thinking, and scholarship are rewarding, shared endeavors. Offerings in ceramics, drawing, painting, photography, printmaking, and sculpture provide broad experience in art practice, with one-to-one instruction in studio classes. Students have the option of pursuing a bachelor’s degree in studio art. All majors also take introductory survey and period courses in art history, instilling a knowledge of significant achievements of major artists and movements. Our bachelor’s degree in art history gives students the opportunity to focus their studies on the broad span of art accomplishment across cultures and periods.

The Department of Art’s Exhibition and Lectures Program contributes to the energy and vitality of the department by bringing the work of contemporary artists from across the United States to campus and offering stimulating lectures by renowned artists, critics, and scholars.

Beyond the studio and lecture hall, we also have offerings in study abroad, art in the community, and career preparation, as well as providing internship opportunities.

The Department of Art, a charter member of the National Association of Schools of Art and Design and the oldest accredited department in the Southeast, prepares students for careers as studio artists or other art-related pursuits and advanced study.

Excellent facilities, accomplished faculty/artists, faculty/scholars, and a well-designed curriculum create an ideal setting for the study of art.

Visit our Web site for additional information and take a closer look at some of the activities and accomplishments of our faculty and students.

COMMUNICATION & JOURNALISM

The Department of Communication & Journalism offers bachelor’s degrees in communication; journalism; public relations; and radio, television and film. The department also offers a master’s degree in communication with thesis and non-thesis options. Graduate and undergraduate students receive the most current and relevant information available in a forum that encourages the students’ intellectual growth.

Communication – Employers consistently rank communication skills as first among qualities they seek in future employees. By understanding the communication process, students can better prepare themselves for living and working in an increasingly diverse and complex society. The communication major focuses on how people create and share meaning within and across a variety of contexts, cultures, channels, and media.

Journalism – While the program embraces the enduring principles of journalism, it also ensures students have access to cutting-edge technology by maintaining state-of-the-art labs for writing, editing, design, photography and online research. Students hone their skills by reporting for The Auburn Plainsman, an award-winning student newspaper.

Public Relations – Students majoring in public relations enter the career field proficient in the skills necessary to be successful. Public relations courses cover the technological, managerial, and skill-related aspects of this growing field. In addition to classroom work, students have many opportunities to get practical experience by engaging in service learning. Graduates in public relations are instrumental in counseling organizations on making socially responsible decisions and communicating with their many audiences.

Radio, Television and Film – The RTVF major instructs students in a variety of ways to understand the mass media. Production and writing courses teach students the skills necessary to work as media professionals. RTVF students also have opportunities to gain hands-on, practical experience from several forms of media: Eagle Eye, a television news magazine program produced entirely by students; WEGL, the student-operated radio station; and several AU sports productions. Students participate in exciting internships to gain valuable work experience in a variety of professional environments. Many RTVF graduates are successful in a range of media and non-media related careers.

COMMUNICATION DISORDERS

The Department of Communication Disorders trains future speech-language pathologists and audiologists. The department offers undergraduate and graduate degree programs. At the undergraduate level, we offer a bachelor’s degree in communication disorders. At the graduate level, we offer master’s degrees in communication disorders and the doctor of audiology.

The training programs in speech-language pathology and audiology are accredited by the Council on Academic Accreditation in Audiology and Speech-Language Pathology of the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association.

Recently, U.S. News and World Report ranked Auburn’s audiology and speech pathology programs within the top 50 programs nationally.

The department operates a full-service speech and hearing clinic, which has been in operation for more than 60 years and serves the people of east Alabama with speech, hearing, or language disorders.

While the clinic serves as a training opportunity for students, every case is closely supervised by departmental faculty to ensure the highest quality service to its clients. Each faculty member has a specific area of expertise within the field of communication disorders, and many are nationally recognized for their research, textbooks, and clinical abilities.

Special admission into the undergraduate major is required. Any major may apply.

ECONOMICS

Economics is the study of how individuals, firms, governments, and societies make decisions concerning the allocation of scarce resources. Economics is the central science underlying business and significant portions of public policy. Undergraduate majors find employment in a wide array of areas including banking, real estate, insurance, financial management, sales, and public administration. Economics consistently ranks among the top undergraduate majors in terms of mid-career salary levels and admissions to law school.

The Department of Economics offers a bachelor’s degree and a minor in economics, and our majors can choose between two different program tracks. The primary track allows students to choose their own outside minor to complement their study of economics and advance their career goals. Political science, finance, business administration, and foreign languages are some of the common choices for an outside minor. The quantitative track is a specialized program designed to give students maximum advantage for graduate education in economics.

An education in economics prepares students for employment in a wide variety of jobs, or, as commonly is the case, serves as an excellent foundation from which to pursue law school or other advanced degree work.

Historically, graduates of our doctoral program in economics have found rewarding career positions in academia, state and federal government agencies, and private firms. Students must achieve satisfactory performance on comprehensive examinations in microeconomics, macroeconomics, econometrics, and two advanced fields, then write and orally defend a dissertation.

ENGLISH

A bachelor’s degree in English allows students to choose one of three tracks for their plan of study:

The Creative Writing Track introduces students to the skills in how to write fiction and poetry to prepare them for careers in editing, publishing, and any career that values quality writing. Public readings and the annual Auburn Writers Conference provide opportunities for these students to showcase their work.

The Literature Track introduces students to many major and minor texts in American, British, and World Literature. The Literature track prepares students for such careers as education, law, divinity, and business.

The Professional Writing & Literacy Studies Track introduces students to writing for the world of work. Students take courses in different kinds of writing, rhetoric, and argumentation in order to prepare them for careers in technical or business communication, editing, design and publishing, or any field for which good writing is necessary.

Our faculty members teach, publish, and connect with others through numerous research publications and a variety of activities aimed at supporting literacy and the humanities:

- The Southern Humanities Review, Alabama’s premier literary and critical journal
- The Auburn Writers Conference, featuring published creative writers talking about their work
- Auburn Summer in London Program, providing students with six-weeks study in London, led by an English Department faculty member

FOREIGN LANGUAGES & LITERATURES

The Department of Foreign Languages and Literatures offers majors in French, German, and Spanish, and minors in Asian Studies (Japanese and Mandarin Chinese), Classics (Greek or Latin), French, German, Global Cultures, Italian Studies, and Spanish. Russian courses are also offered.

The department offers a bachelor’s degree in foreign languages/international trade in French, German, or Spanish. These degrees provide students with a solid foundation in their chosen language and an in-depth study of communicating in a business on a variety of topics. As a liberal arts degree, its main strength is the range of knowledge students acquire in the language, history, culture, and business practices of the countries where their chosen language is spoken.

Allied programs include International Business, Foreign Language Education, and Languages Across the Curriculum.

Study abroad opportunities:
- Semester study in Alcalá de Henares, Spain, and Taormina, Italy
- Summer study abroad available in Paris, France; San José, Costa Rica; Salamanca and Madrid, Spain; Taormina, Italy; Vienna, Austria; and Shanghai, China

Undergraduate Internship Opportunities:
- Soon to be available in Beijing, China and Seville, Spain, among other locations around the world

Students who major in foreign languages and literatures often are more valuable in the job marketplace, and graduates often attribute foreign language courses and study abroad experience as the most beneficial experience to their careers due to the communication skills and cultural knowledge developed in the process.

HISTORY

History students think critically, read widely and deeply, and write and speak persuasively. Because a major in history teaches not only knowledge of the past but also the skills of research, analysis, and effective communication of information, you can find history graduates in practically all sectors of the workforce.

Auburn history graduates hold leadership positions in education, public administration, law, public relations, medicine, industry, historic preservation, archives, athletics, the military, and many other fields and occupations.

The Department of History offers the undergraduate major and minor, as well as graduate degrees and certificates in history, archives, and public history. The major in history takes students on an intellectual journey across the breadth of human history where they can explore fundamental questions about the organization of societies, the development of religious faiths, and the complexities of global politics. Students can take courses in such varied topics as the history of technology, American religion, modern Africa, Rome, the Civil War in American Memory, Medieval Europe, and modern Latin America. All majors conclude their degree with a focused senior thesis project, researching and writing about an original topic of their own design.

History faculty members are researchers and teachers, producing works of scholarship based on solid research and path-breaking interpretations even as they mentor students and train them in the skills of historical thinking and research. Recent publications by faculty address such varied topics as Civil Rights in the Lyndon Johnson administration, Creek-Anglo trade in the 18th Century American Southeast, fashion and design in 17th Century France, Glenn Curtiss and the birth of naval aviation, religion and politics of the 1811 Battle of Tippecanoe, early 19th Century Parisian urban renewal, and Confederate soldiers who joined the army in the later years of the Civil War.

We have great students, great faculty, and great fun exploring the past together.

Studying philosophy is exciting and challenging. It helps equip the student with tools necessary for career success and for leading a thoughtful life. It confronts the student with deep and vexing questions. Answering life’s philosophical questions develops analytical skills and a healthy respect for the value and difficulty of thinking clearly.

The Department of Philosophy at Auburn University is small enough to ensure that students receive individual attention. The faculty is very active in research and ranks among the best departments in the university.

Students are involved with the local chapter of the Phi Sigma Tau honor society, an international honor society for students in philosophy. The Auburn Philosophical Society also provides students with frequent opportunities for interaction with the faculty and with one another.

In addition, the department offers:
- A faculty of well-qualified, award-winning instructors committed to a high standard of teaching and involvement within the philosophical community
- One of the most active departments on campus. Faculty and invited speakers present papers at Auburn Philosophical Society meetings on a regular basis
- An annual international philosophy conference
- Two learning communities: “Philosophy and the Arts” and “Philosophy, Politics and Economics”
- Small class sizes (around 15 students) in upper division courses

The Department of Psychology, with 400–450 undergraduate students, is one of the largest undergraduate programs in the university. The department provides a broad, research-oriented curriculum with course work in statistics, research methods, and the diverse offerings representative of the breadth of psychology as a natural and social science.

At the graduate level, there are three PhD programs that enroll approximately 80–90 students and produce the largest number of doctoral graduates of any department in the university. The PhD programs in clinical psychology, industrial/organizational psychology, and cognitive and behavioral sciences are strong research programs and have a rich history of providing outreach for the state.

For our doctoral students, we offer a unique teaching fellows program through which we train graduate students to be effective instructors. In addition, the department offers a master’s program in applied behavior analysis with developmental disabilities in which graduate students work with local agencies to assist autistic and developmentally-disabled children. Other outreach activities include Project Uplift, an organization devoted to providing volunteer mentors to at-risk children, and a long-terms project with Head Start.

The Psychological Services Center, a multipurpose training and research clinic, provides psychological services to children, adolescents, and adults, as well as outreach support for schools and other social organizations. In addition, the department has several projects dealing with some of the most significant social problems in Alabama.

Through a large contract with the Alabama Division of Youth Services, the department manages and staffs a treatment program for juvenile sex offenders. Such activities bring faculty and students in contact with real human problems, which require the intellectual capital available in the Department of Psychology at Auburn University.

Political Science. 7080 Haley Center. Auburn, AL 36849. (334) 844-5370
www.cla.auburn.edu/polisci

Auburn University offers a major and a minor in political science. The Department of Political Science has more than 600 students and oversees three undergraduate degree programs featuring separate majors in political science, public administration, and health services administration.

Career options for political science majors include law; employment with government at the federal, state, or local level; journalism; campaign management; political polling; working with private interest groups and associations; positions with international organizations and businesses; non-profit organizations; and teaching.

The department also houses a pre-law advisor who provides information about law schools and legal careers.

The Political Science Department has 22 dedicated professors who hold doctoral and law degrees from the nation’s most prestigious universities. Our professors have won countless college, university, and even national teaching awards. The research and scholarship of our professors is well respected by the national and international political science communities.

For more advanced students who have already earned a bachelor’s degree, the department offers courses of study leading to two different post-graduate degrees—a master’s degree in public administration and a doctoral degree in public administration and public policy.

The Department of Theatre is accredited by the National Association of Schools of Theatre and offers a bachelor's degree in theatre and two bachelor's degrees in performance (acting or music theatre concentration) and production (design/technology or management concentration).

The bachelor of art in theatre is designed for students seeking a broad foundation in the study of theatre and drama within the liberal arts and humanities curriculum. It is particularly suitable for students interested in theatre history, dramatic literature, and theatre criticism as a means of preparing for further study or employment in a variety of fields, including theatre, law, education, and communication.

The bachelor of fine art programs are for students interested in more specialized training for careers in professional theatre and are available only by audition or portfolio presentation interviews. Auburn theatre graduates are in demand. The department's recent graduates have received offers of further training and/or employment from Catholic University, The Alabama Shakespeare Festival, Walt Disney World, The University of Central Florida, The Colorado Shakespeare Festival, The University of Southern Mississippi, and The Savannah College of Art and Design. Many of our graduates have thriving careers working within and beyond the entertainment industry.

The department's distinguished faculty, professional guest artists, and excellent facilities ensure that students majoring in theatre receive a comprehensive, quality education.

Auburn University Theatre is preparing to break ground on a new, state-of-the-art experimental theatre addition. The new space will provide students the opportunity to learn and work in a flexible theatre space that reflects current trends in the theatre arts as well the kinds of facilities they can look forward to working in after graduation.

Sociology

Sociology is a fundamental social science discipline that studies the collective dimensions of human social behavior. The range of disciplines is great, and includes the study of human interaction, groups, organizations, social psychological processes, family life, deviant behavior, social problems, legal institutions, medical systems, intercultural studies, human population dynamics, international development, and social change.

Anthropology

Anthropologists may work in an academic setting or in a variety of other areas, from government and human services to manufacturing and retail industries. These occupations may involve the following: conducting research, implementing policy, teaching, or providing expertise in the areas of health, development, education, or the corporate world.

Social Work

People who choose social work as a career want to make a difference in people's lives. With the bachelor's degree in social work, the job possibilities are manifold. The career opportunities for someone in social work include work at a variety of social service and advocacy organizations. This degree is accredited by the Council on Social Work Education.

CAROLINE MARSHALL DRAUGHON CENTER FOR THE ARTS & HUMANITIES

The Caroline Marshall Draughon Center for the Arts & Humanities is the outreach office for the College of Liberal Arts. Its mission is to serve the citizens of Alabama through outreach, research, and instruction in the arts and humanities. The center develops and offers programming in schools, towns, and communities around the state that strengthens the bonds between the academic community, the arts, and the general public. Thousands of Alabama citizens benefit from its programs annually.

Some of the center’s major initiatives are:
- Auburn Writers Conference, an annual gathering of new and established writers designed to offer instruction, practice, perspective, and community
- Becoming Alabama, an annual public symposium on some aspect of Alabama history, culture, and landscape
- Pebble Hill Imprint, a publication partnership with the University of Alabama Press that brings forth scholarship growing from or contributing to the center’s work
- The Gnu’s Room Partnership, a collaboration with a local non-profit bookstore to promote the arts and humanities in the Auburn community
- Volunteer opportunities for students with hands-on, project-oriented assignments

The center operates under the College of Liberal Arts and is deeply committed to promoting the humanities, as well as the performing, literary, and fine arts, through its many diverse and educational programs.

Africana Studies

The Africana Studies minor is based on an interdisciplinary curriculum so as to embrace the bodies of knowledge and research methods of the social sciences, the sciences, the humanities, the arts, and business. Offering courses from multiple disciplines creates a vibrant and engaging intellectual environment in which students study with faculty who have outstanding scholarship on the important historical, cultural, social, political, and economic aspects of Africans and the African Diaspora. Africana Studies courses supplement and sometimes challenge predominant Euro-centric disciplinary offerings and provide students with African-centered perspectives from within and across areas of study. The Africana Studies curriculum is equally unique in its comparative methodology that enables students to study the historical and contemporary challenges facing people of African descent in different regional settings while developing cross-cultural, international, and transnational perspectives.

The Africana Studies course offerings provide a broad survey of a scholarly tradition that has produced knowledge about people of African origin in the following areas:
- Foundations in African-American Studies
- Significance of African Heritage
- African Ethnicity and Family Studies (such as African Women’s Issues)
- Sociological Studies including class stratification
- Psychological Studies relating to people of African descent
- Contemporary African Politics
- Cross-cultural, International and Transnational studies
- African Development Studies
- Cultural, Literary and Aesthetic studies of people of African Descent
- African Philosophy and Religious Studies
- Historical Studies and Anthropological Methods
- Black Entrepreneurship

These topics are covered in the four areas of concentration offered by the Africana Studies minor, (Pan-African History and Thought, Black Urban Studies, Black Entrepreneurship, and African Development Studies) and the director will guide students in putting together a package of courses that would give them competence in any one or a combination of these concentrations.

COMMUNITY & CIVIC ENGAGEMENT

The Community and Civic Engagement (CCE) Initiative is based on Auburn University’s historic commitment of service and the College of Liberal Arts’ mission to foster an intellectual community where students have an understanding of the human condition, a respect for individual and cultural differences, and a desire for the free exchange of ideas. Through civic engagement, individuals—as citizens of their communities, their nations, and the world—are empowered as agents of positive social change for a more democratic world.

The mission of CCE is to create a culture of faculty and student engagement both within and outside the university that will address and solve challenges facing communities. By creating an interface between the scholarly activities of Auburn University faculty and students and the expertise of community partners, Auburn University will strengthen the land-grant mission that has promoted a long tradition of scholarly service to the local, regional, national, and international community. The goals of the Community and Civic Engagement Initiative are to continue this Auburn tradition of service and scholarship, to further collaboration among the diverse disciplines in the College of Liberal Arts, to highlight the unique outreach activities initiated by our faculty and students, to provide a context for the creation of shared knowledge between Auburn University and its multiple community partners, to advance community-engaged scholarship, and to provide students with the skills to become effective local and global citizens.

Within CCE, we offer a minor in Community and Civic Engagement. Students who want to serve their communities and want to learn how to apply their academic disciplines in making contributions to the larger society will find the minor in community and civic engagement rewarding and worthwhile. The faculty teaching in the program themselves are committed to community and civic engagement and have designed classes that will provide context, skills, tools, and methods for understanding and addressing public issues. This is an interdisciplinary minor that offers each student an opportunity to complete at least one service-learning course that will place students in a community setting to apply the knowledge they are learning in the classroom and to gain knowledge from community partners in a mutually-beneficial relationship.

PRE-LAW SCHOLARS PROGRAM

The College of Liberal Arts sponsors the Pre-Law Scholars Program. The program is interdisciplinary and is open to all students of any major who intend to pursue careers within the legal profession. Students may engage in a pre-law academic concentration within their major course of study and may choose among pre-law elective courses as their academic schedules permit.

The program offers career counseling and law school application counseling to students interested in legal careers. There is a practitioner-in-residence who serves as an advisor and is available to meet with students in pursuit of a legal career. Students are invited to discuss opportunities within various legal specialties and the day-to-day duties of lawyers within these specialties, choice of major or minor, choice of elective courses, choice of law school, paralegal degrees and opportunities, and the law school application process (including drafting of the personal statement and obtaining recommendations).

The program provides an information network to Auburn’s pre-law students as well as internship and employment opportunities, speakers, elective course offerings, social events, and opportunities to meet privately with visiting law school admissions deans.

The Pre-Law Scholars Program also supports extracurricular honors and activities:

- Pi Lambda Sigma is the Pre-Law Honor Society. Pi Lambda Sigma sponsors several events during the year, including the annual Auburn University Law School Fair, hosting admissions deans and professors from approximately 50 law schools across the U.S., trips to court proceedings, visits to law school campuses, speakers, and social events.
- Auburn University Mock Trial Competition Team is an academic team that competes against other undergraduate teams from around the country in tournaments sponsored by the American Mock Trial Association.

WOMEN’S LEADERSHIP INSTITUTE

The Women’s Leadership Institute (WLI) was established to help women associated with Auburn University take a proactive step in closing the gender gap created by the underrepresentation of women in politics, corporate boardrooms, and the administrations of business and educational institutions.

The WLI creates a network, think tank, and cutting-edge learning environment to empower all women for a lifetime of leadership.

The WLI was created in 2004 to address the leadership gap in the top ranks in all fields. The institute began as the first partner in the southeast with the Center for American Women and Politics in their NEW LeadershipTM Residential Intensive Training program, and there are now six new programs designed for Auburn students, alumni and the community. Throughout each year, WLI hosts and sponsors several lectures promoting leadership. The WLI brings top women leaders—national figures and often Auburn graduates or community members—in direct contact with our students so that they can engage with the women who have excelled in leadership roles.

The Extraordinary Women Lecture Series provides students and the general public the opportunity to interact with and be inspired by outstanding women leaders. This lecture series is aimed at enhancing the possibility while presenting women capable of leadership roles that draw from everyday society has to offer using conventional sociopolitical tools and working with the values available to them.

Speakers to date include Lt. General Leslie Kenne, Deputy Chief of Staff for Warfighting Integration; Lilly Ledbetter, women’s equality advocate; and Mary C. Wilson, founder and president emeritus of The White House Project and co-creator of “Take Our Daughters and Sons to Work Day.”

WOMEN’S STUDIES

The minor in Women’s Studies allows students to explore issues related to women and gender across academic disciplines, including:

- Women’s roles in society, culture, politics, history, economics
- Issues of class, race, and ethnic and sexual identity
- Political and moral questions about gender roles in today’s world
- The impact of gender on science and technology
- How behavior and language shape notions of gender

Women’s Studies graduates find that the minor provides useful tools to succeed in any field. Students in Women’s Studies courses have many opportunities to improve their communication, research, and critical thinking skills. Furthermore, the program nurtures self-confidence and encourages personal development. All of this gives Women’s Studies students an edge in the competitive job market, graduate school, and life in general.

The Women’s Studies program sponsors lectures, performances, workshops, conferences, and other activities throughout the academic year.

The Auburn University Women’s Studies program cooperates with organizations and initiatives both on campus and off that strive to raise the quality of women’s lives and endeavors within the University and throughout the broader community. We work with Safe Harbor, the sexual violence prevention and response unit on campus; the Women’s Leadership Institute; the Women’s Resource Center; WISE (Women in Science and Engineering); and the Office of Diversity and Multicultural Affairs. We also offer support to our affiliated student organization, the Auburn Feminist Alliance (AFA); and the Women’s Studies Graduate Student Organization (WSGSO).
